

Whenever a law is made, it is supposed to be made for the good of the greater whole of the people affected. If a law is made in a republic that does not serve the greater good of the people then that law has no right to be enforced. A law that would make viewing private electronic information easier for authorities would only help in a small number of cases. Take for instance the methods by which the authorities might propose to find someone they would like to spy on such as looking for key words, generic background information, and unusual internet traffic. All of these methods, if they worked, would be ideal for locating people to spy on. Instead, these methods are highly inefficient as many suspected users are innocent of any crime worthy of their loss of privacy. One's privacy is one of the things that the constitution may be vague on, however people do have a right to live out their lives in happiness. When people's happiness comes second in the United States is the day that the government has failed to support its people. Shame on upon all who try to "protect" others by violating the rights of others "legally." The privacy in the electronic world is already bad. Why do you guys need to pass a law making your hacking into other people's lives easier when you can already do it? I for one, along with many, will never allow our rights to be infringed upon any further after the passing of the "Patriot" act which has done nothing worthy enough to make up for the harm done to the average American. Shame on those who cannot perceive the damage that they do because they are too absorbed into their own world and ideals. Not all people share these ideals, but many do share the same general ideas and that is the people's will. No one knows the will of the people except the people. Try to pass something that does not favor the people and they will fight back. Do not try to pass this bill, why don't you guys try a more clever way to violate our rights instead.
